Our longer-term goal of this visit is to collaborate on projects that will enhance the knowledge base of archaeology and provide opportunities that will contribute to the growth of the student learning experience. Central to the control of prehistoric chronology, numerous field and laboratory experiments have been conducted over the years to investigate models of water diffusion in glass and their ability to accurately date the past. Numerous research papers have been published on the dating method in addition to a recent book with his Greek colleague on obsidian glass studies.
